To evaluate the results of intravenous contrast enhanced CT (IV-CT) in hypotensive patients with negative DSA. From October 2003 to October 2005, IV-CT was performed in 54 hypotensive patients with normal DSA. Thirty-one of the hypotensive patients with a history of chronic liver disease, defined as patients with at least one follow-up DSA demonstrating enlarged liver volume, received IV-CT examinations. Twenty-one hypotensive patients with a history of peripheral vascular disease, defined as patients with at least one follow-up DSA demonstrating a blocked vein or graft vessel, received IV-CT examinations. Mean follow-up time of the patients ranged from 4 months to 5 years. All IV-CT examinations were performed with a 4-slice scanner. Portal venous phase images and portal venous phase images plus delayed images were obtained. Delayed images were obtained 15 and 20 min after injection of the contrast media. IV-CT examinations in 13 patients (42%) showed renal vasculitis. In the patients with chronic liver disease, the results of IV-CT examinations showed eight (31%) patients with various degrees of hepatic vasculitis. In the group of patients with peripheral vascular disease, IV-CT examinations showed three (14%) patients with arterial vasculitis and three (14%) patients with venous vasculitis. IV-CT examination is a useful tool for the evaluation of hypotensive patients with a normal DSA in patients with chronic liver disease and patients with a history of peripheral vascular disease. In some patients with chronic liver disease or with a history of peripheral vascular disease, renal vasculitis can be detected with IV-CT examination.• Brady (No. 8 in NFL) threw for 309 yards, and
